

Executive Agreements

- An agreement made between the executive branch of the U.S. government and a foreign government without ratification by the Senate.
- Less formal than a treaty and is not subject to the constitutional requirement for ratification by two-thirds of the U.S. Senate.
- The Constitution does not specifically give a president the power to conclude executive agreements.
- However, he may be authorized to do so by Congress, or he may do so on the basis of the power granted him to conduct foreign relations.
- Despite questions about the constitutionality of executive agreements, in 1937 the Supreme Court ruled that they had the same force as treaties. Because executive agreements are made on the authority of the incumbent president, they do not necessarily bind his successors.
