

After its Kind

The biblical view of creation is of a perfect creation made in only six days just a few thousand years ago by an all-powerful and all-wise God. This world was destroyed by a global flood in the days of Noah. An ice age and the separation of the continents produced our present world in a relatively short time.

There are living plants and animals, and there are fossilized plants and animals. If the biblical view is accurate, we would expect that the plants and animals alive today would also be found in the fossil record. Looking back the better we know. Just as living things show limited variation, so fossils would show this variety, but we would not expect to find a plant of variousness looking two kinds. We would expect that since some kinds have become extinct within living memory, so the fossil record should contain some plants and animals not known today. The Flood and subsequent catastrophes offer a ready explanation for the process of fossilization.
