Genes Involved in Microbe-Plant Interactions D.P.S.

Verma, T. Hohn, 2012-12-06 Interdependence between species is a law of nature The degree of this interdependence is vividly evident in the plant microbial world Indeed there is no axenic plant in nature and one finds various forms of interactions between these two kingdoms ranging from completely innocuous to obligate parasitic Most of these interactions are poorly understood at the molecular and physiological levels Only those few cases for which a molecular picture is emerging are discussed in this volume With the advent of recombinant DNA technology and the realization that some of these interactions are very beneficial to the host plant a spate of activity to understand and manipulate these processes is occurring Microbes interact with plants for nutrition In spite of the large number of plant microbe interactions those microbes that cause harm to the plants i e cause disease are very few It is thus obvious that plants have evolved various defense mechanisms to deal with the microbial world The mechanisms for protection are highly diverse and poorly understood Some pathogens have developed very sophisticated mechanisms to parasitize plants an excellent example for this being crown gall caused by a soil bacterium Agrobacterium tumefaciens A remarkable ingenuity is exhibited by this bacterium to manipulate its host to provide nitrogenous compounds which only this bacterium can catabolize This is carried out by a direct gene transfer mechanism from bacteria to plants
