Thermohaline Circulation

Warm, salty water proceeds northward in the Gulf Stream, cooling as it crosses the Atlantic in a northeastward direction as the North Atlantic Current. Upon reaching the subpolar regions, it enters the GIN Seas and then spreads into the Arctic, where it mixes with resident water masses and further increases in density due to additional cooling and salinization associated with sea-ice formation. It eventually subsides and/or convects and flows back out of the GIN Seas at intermediate depths, whereupon it sinks to depths of several thousand meters and proceeds southward as a deep cold boundary current beneath the Gulf Stream. This deep western boundary current is joined in its upper parts by convecting water from the Labrador Sea. Any variation in convection in the source regions of the THC will be reflected in changes in transport, and may therefore affect subsurface regions along the pathway of the deep boundary current, and the sea surface to which the water eventually returns.

Decadal-scale water-column alterations in the Labrador Basin (Figure 5-23) have been documented through repeated sections, surveys, and time-series station observations (e.g., Lazier, 1995). The downstream effects on circulation (McCartney et al., 1997) and ventilation (Molinari et al., 1997) have been observed in the western North Atlantic. Figure 5-23 shows that convection was more intense and deeper in 1992 than in 1966. A time series of the temperature of Labrador Sea Water (LSW), shown in Figure 5-24, reveals the interdecadal nature of its history (McCartney et al., 1997). The temporal evolution of the NAO is also illustrated in Figure 5-24; generally it varies inversely with the
