

DECISION MAKING IN EMERGENCY MEDICINE

Vincent J. Markovchick, MD, FAAEM

- 1. Is there anything unique about emergency medicine?
Although there is significant crossover between emergency medicine and all other clinical specialties, emergency medicine has unique aspects that make it different, such as the approach to patient care and the decision-making process. Emergency medicine physicians must know something about all aspects of medical care, with an emphasis on identifying and treating acute life threats.
- 2. Describe the conventional method of evaluating a patient.
A comprehensive history, physical examination, routine laboratory diagnostic studies, special diagnostic procedures, and the formulation of a problem-oriented medical record and rational course of therapy constitute the ideal approach to patient care, because it is so comprehensive.
- 3. Why is the conventional methodology not ideal for use in the ED?
Even though in retrospect only 10% to 20% of patients presenting to an ED truly have emergent problems, it must be presumed that every patient who comes to an ED has an emergent condition. Therefore the first and most important question that must be answered is, What is the life threat? The conventional approach does not ensure an expeditious answer to this question. Time constraints and limited resources also impede the use of conventional methodology in the ED.
- 4. How do I identify the patient with a life-threatening condition?
Three components are necessary to quickly identify the patient with a life-threatening condition:
 1. A chief complaint and a brief, focused history relevant to the chief complaint
 2. A complete and accurate set of vital signs in the field and in the ED that are accurately taken and critically interpreted
 3. An opportunity to perform a rapid, focused physical examination that includes visualization, auscultation, palpation, and observation
- 5. What is so important about the chief complaint?
The chief complaint, which sometimes cannot be obtained directly from the patient but must be obtained from family members, observers, emergency medical technicians (EMTs), or others at the scene, will immediately help categorize the general type of problem (e.g., cardiac, traumatic, respiratory).
- 6. Why are vital signs important?
Vital signs are the most reliable objective data that are immediately available to ED personnel, provided they are accurately taken and critically interpreted. Vital signs and the chief complaint, when used as triage tools, will identify the majority of patients with life-threatening conditions. Familiarity with normal vital signs for all age groups is essential.
- 7. What are the determinants of (normal) vital signs?
Age, underlying physical condition, medical problems (e.g., hypertension), and current medications (e.g., β -blockers) are important considerations in determining normal vital signs for a given patient. For example, a well-conditioned, young athlete who has just sustained major trauma and arrives with a resting supine pulse of 80 beats per minute may have significant blood loss because the normal pulse is probably in the range of 40 to 50 beats per minute.
- 8. What is the most inaccurate vital sign taken in the field and ED?
In the field the most common inaccurate vital sign is the respiratory rate, because it is sometimes estimated rather than counted. In the ED the temperature may be inaccurate if a tympanic
