

Clinical Integration of Patients' Preferences in Treatment Decision Making Among Women With Infertility: A Cross-sectional Study

Mohammad Ali Alshrouf¹, Abdulrahman Mahmoud Karam², Muayad Imad Azzam³, Nadia Muhaidat^{2*}

Abstract

Objectives: This study aimed to evaluate infertile women's treatment-seeking behavior and to determine the factors that impact the treatment method choices while assessing patients' views regarding infertility management.

Materials and Methods: This cross-sectional survey was distributed anonymously online and targeted infertile females seeking infertility treatment and included participants from all the 12 governorates in Jordan. An electronic questionnaire was designed, which was then distributed on several social media platforms during January 2021. This study included 429 participants seeking in vitro fertilization (IVF), and 52 were seeking intrauterine insemination (IUI) as a treatment modality. The study aimed to examine the aspects that influence infertile women's treatment-seeking behavior and technique selection.

Results: A total of 481 infertile females aged 21-50 years were included in the study. There was a statistically significant relationship between treatment modality and the number of children ($P = 0.012$), years of trying to conceive ($P = 0.006$), and causes of infertility ($P = 0.017$). Participants who wanted to use the IUI method had a significantly higher average number of children (IUI vs. IVF: 0.88 ± 1.11 , 0.46 ± 0.96). Calculating the binary logistic regression to predict the selection of a treatment method based on prior trials of IVF and IUI indicated that the IVF prior trial is a significant predictor method of treatment selection ($P < 0.001$).

Conclusions: The decisions regarding infertility treatment should be shared between the patient and the treating physician. Socioeconomic status, past gynecological, and infertility history should be evaluated to better understand the patient's preference.

Keywords: Reproductive techniques, Decision making, Fertility clinics, Infertility, Socioeconomic factors.

Introduction

Infertility is a disease defined by an individual's failure to achieve a clinical pregnancy despite having regular sexual intercourse for at least 12 months without using any type of contraception or due to a person's reproductive capacity being impaired, whether on a personal level or as a couple (1). Infertility is a universal health concern, with an estimated 15% of couples of reproductive age suffering from it worldwide (2,3). In Jordan, the estimated percentage of women with primary infertility is approximately 8.9% (4). Thus, it is a major challenge for the health system, especially considering the high proportion of Jordanian infertile couples suffering from psychological and stress problems (5).

Regardless of the availability of advanced infertility treatment methods, only 56% of infertile couples seek medical treatment (6). Several factors influence the decision whether to seek medical help or not, age being the main factor encouraging couples to visit infertility clinics (7). This can be explained by the fact that age is a major determinant of the chances of conception, with older women having lower fecundability rates than younger couples (8). In addition, the number of cycles couples attempted is linked to their degree of education and family income (9). Many other socio-demographic factors also play a role, with ethnicity being one of the major determinants for receiving treatment (10).

In addition to the issues of the prevalence of infertility and its detrimental impacts on the individual, household, and society, patients are confronted with various treatment options, indications, complications, burdens, and costs. Therefore, this study aimed to examine the aspects that influence infertile women's treatment-seeking behavior and technique selection. In addition, it assessed patients' views regarding infertility management. According to our search, no studies have addressed this issue, making this the first study to provide guidance for all reproductive health physicians facing similar situations and a better understanding of what their patients need to plan their treatment in an attempt to improve clinical outcomes.
