Decision Support Systems: A Decade in Perspective

The IFIP WG 8.5 Working Conference on "Decision Support Systems: A Decade in Perspective" was held in Noordwijkerhout, The Netherlands from June 16-19, 1986.

We present below a description of the 14 topical lectures delivered at this conference.

DSS Literature

In the 1970's, a new philosophy of how computers could be used to support managerial decision making emerged under the name Decision Support Systems (DSS). According to R.L. Olson, G.P. Huber and M.L. Hart (University of Texas at Austin, U.S.A.), this philosophy embodied unique, exciting ideas for how such systems should be designed and implemented and held much promise for improving decision making in organizations. Today, according to the lecturers, DSS has become established in the mainstream of information systems research and practice. In their presentation, Olson, Huber and Hart described and assessed the DSS literature published from 1975 through 1985. Their description is based on an examination of 111 articles published in 20 refereed journals. Their lecture was appropriately entitled "An Examination of the DSS Literature (1975-1985)".

DSS in Context

In a presentation entitled "DSS in Context", R.W. Sprague, Jr. (University of Newark, U.S.A.) proposed a characteristic which promises to be more helpful than traditional measures for organizing the way information systems are built and used. In the first part of his lecture Sprague examined the overall objective or mission for information systems in organizations. The next section introduced the concept of Type I and Type II information handling activities which are to be supported or improved through the use of information systems. Sprague then looked at some key developments during the past decade viewed in this new context. Finally, he suggested future developments to be expected to enhance the contribution of DSS to the overall mission.

Relational Framework

According to R.W. Blowing (Vanderbilt University, TN, U.S.A.), an important purpose of the research being done on DSS is to develop a framework for information management that is as independent as possible of the way in which the information is stored and processed. Blowing pointed out that a framework that appears promising in this regard is one based on the mathematics of relations, initially proposed fifteen years ago by computer scientists to provide a theoretical foundation for database management, it has led to an established research literature and a growing number of implemented database management systems. A similar framework was proposed five years ago for the management of decision models, and more recently for the management of assertions, i.e. statements in a two-valued propositional logic. In a lecture entitled "A Relational Framework for Information Management", Blowing described the state of the art in relational model and assertion management and examined its applicability to another type of information, that which is
