

THE UNITED STATES vs. BURR

After this open discomfiture the prosecution had no choice but to withdraw the Commodore and cover his retreat as best it might, and the move was effected in good order, ending in an apparently formidable stand with Peter Taylor, the gardener of Blennerhassett's Island.

Blennerhassett's Island was known to have been the headquarters of the conspirators, and it was there, if anywhere, that the government should have been able to locate some treasonable act on Burr's part to support the indictment. Up to this point all the testimony had related to what Burr had said. Now, with a witness from the scene of action, it was expected that evidence of his treasonable acts would be forthcoming, and the excitement rose to high pitch. Taylor started off bravely by repeating a conversation he had had with Blennerhassett about getting together a company of young men with rifles. These men were wanted, he was informed, to aid in settling some lands which Burr had purchased, and later his employer advised him that Burr and he intended an invasion of Mexico. The witness thereupon told Blennerhassett that the people had got it into their heads that Burr and he intended to divide the Union, to which reply was made
