

THESIS : ACHEBE PRESENTING THE AFTERMATHS OF DECOLONISATION / MARGINALISATION OF INDIGENOUS

INTRO : 150

"While this nationalism seeks to liberate the multitude from foreign domination, it erects domestic structures of domination that are equally severe." For Michael and Negri , a nation's postcolonial objective of political autonomy from colonialism often ignores its own subjects , utilising force and violence against them. By imitating the same foreign, hegemonic structures , the quandary of liberating 'multitude from foreign domination' is depicted clearly through political abuse in Achebe's Anbhiwils of the Savannah. Achebe's novel exposes the aftermath of decolonisation , the problems of political leadership in post-independent African nations under the fictional state Kangan. The abuse of power in Anbhiwils of the Savannah is observed through the marginalisation of the Abazonians , who are a metonymical portrayal of African natives. This essay will attempt to explore the complexity of decolonisation , the consequences of a post-colonial Africa through Achebe's novel Anbhiwils of the Savannah.

Liberation from colonial in a postcolonial epoch was expected to introduce political conciliation and stability as well as cultural, social harmony to African nations. However , it generated a reposition from anti-imperialist codes spreading independence and peace to postcolonial cynicism and abuse of power. Within nations that have been decolonised and liberated from foreign imperialism, arises the issue of neo-colonialism. Achebe illustrates this in his fictional post-colonial state Kangan , a latitude of subjugation and power against the indigenous Abazonians. Segall defines neo-colonialism as : "the regressive impact of unregulated forms of aid, trade, and foreign direct investment; and the collaboration of African leaders with foreign leaders to ensure that the interests of both are met with little concern for the development, sustainability and poverty reduction and wellbeing in African countries". This phenomenon is employed in Achebe's novel ; Ikem challenges power abuse by nationalist elites : "leaders who openly looted our treasury, whose effrontery soiled our national soul". Ikem denounces African leaders , who imitate the actions of colonisers that "loot" from their own indigenous people and land. The plurality of "our" evokes a post-colonial unity and voice for reclaiming back the nation from coloniser-like African leaders. Achebe illustrates African leaders as this micro image of criminal "looters" to expose the cataclysmic , facade of postcolonial Africa. Fanon asserts "In the colonial territories, the bourgeois cast draws its strength after independence chiefly from agreement reached with the former colonial power". Here, Fanon suggests that in the period of decolonisation , the "bourgeoise cast" able to gain power and governance because of their 'elitist education' , thus imposing neo-colonialism against native , lower-class Africans.

"You see, they are not in the least like ourselves. They don't need and can't use the luxuries that you and I must have. They have the animal capacity to endure the pain of, shall we say, domestication. The very words the white master had said in his time about the black race as a whole. Now we say them about the poor."
