

THE CHANGING FACE OF BRITAIN

The first of two parts.

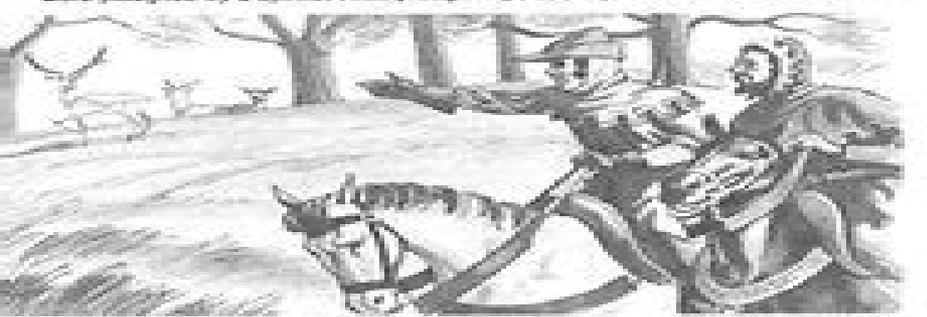

Changing seas in kind of glacial forests and marshy, land-raised valleys. That the Romans came along

Walls, paved roads were built to carry troops and military supplies, but often the Roman road was the village track which led to repair them.

The roads of the Middle Ages were unshaded green tracks. From autumn to spring, some villages were reached in a sea of mud, surrounded except by the walls. By the fourteenth century roads were made of stone in places they were polished by a special road through each of the parish church.

The medieval kings designed some forest areas royal preserves for hunting deer and boar. Others reserved the forests. By Tudor times the forests were shrinking. Timber was killed for ship-building and to make charcoal for smelting iron, manufacturing brick, glass and wallpaper and for building and cart.

Most areas were covered with trees. The Forest of Arden was 40 miles wide and covered much of East and South. Essex, Surrey, Hampshire and the midland clay areas were densely wooded. In Essex, Warwick and medieval times, woodcut areas were gradually cleared for arable agriculture.

Medieval fields were large and were divided into individual farms called strips. The big grassed area was used for horses. The rest was sown in wheat or corn. One third of the land was left fallow. Cows were used as draught beasts. Horses were kept for riding.
