

Discourse organization

- There are several ways of demonstrating informally that discourse is organized. First, conversationalists themselves frequently refer to discourse structure in the course of conversation, by utterances such as oh, by the way...., anyway, as I was saying In everyday situations, people are aware that not anything can follow anything: some utterance require to be prefaced by such an excuse or a claim of relevance. This insertion of metatext, pointing to the organization of the text itself, is particularly common in certain discourse styles, such as lecturing, and it occurs in written and spoken discourse.
