

Sustainability Challenge for Academic Libraries: Planning for the Future

Maria Anna Jankowska and James W. Marcum

There is growing concern that a variety of factors threaten the sustainability of academic libraries: developing and preserving print and digital collections, supplying and supporting rapidly changing technological and networking infrastructure, providing free services, maintaining growing costs of library buildings, and lowering libraries' ecological footprint. This paper discusses the multidimensional issues of sustainability in academic libraries and identifies needs for designing an integrated framework for sustainable strategies in academic libraries. Additionally, the paper presents a synthesis of existing literature on the increasingly popular topic of "green libraries" and prepares a background toward developing a framework for sustainable strategies in academic libraries.

A paradox of modern academic libraries is that, while they strive to introduce new technologies to respond to evolving user information needs, they are still mostly organized around traditional information formats. A large part of the library building's spaces are dedicated to shelving for books, print, and digital materials. A major public perception survey demonstrates that books continue to be the library's brand.¹ In the digital age, this poses a challenge for the economic sustainability of libraries, since brands are difficult and costly to change. The value and utility of the book is coming under increased scrutiny, largely due to the fact that users are trading off physical access to print books and research journals for the convenience and speed of virtual access to digital materials. Considering the trend toward digital collections and social networking services, the key concern is whether the blended model of traditional (mostly based on print resources) plus hybrid (based on mixes of print and digital resources) and a new Library 2.0 (based on social networking services) model is socially, economically, and environmentally sustainable.

Digital formats and networking services are costly and require extensive technical, human, and financial support. Additionally, they consume considerable quantities of energy and water, as well as ink and paper for printouts. Developing a blended model of print and digital resources supported by social networking services has raised a major concern that sustainable progress of academic libraries is threatened by a variety of factors such as: developing and preserving print and
