Guide for Air Force Change of Command Ceremonies Glenn C. Easterly, AIR COMMAND AND STAFF COLL MAXWELL AFB AL., 1986 Counting squadron group wing division intermediate headquarters and major command levels there are hundreds of change of command ceremonies that take place throughout the Air Force each year Although each individual ceremony has unique characteristics the one thing common to all is that each entails the planning coordination and implementation of seemingly endless details While the guidance contained in AFT 50 14 Drill and Ceremonies for conducting ceremonies seems straightforward the real trick is weaving those details together in a fashion that will produce a first class event The outgoing commander is traditionally responsible for all change of command ceremony arrangements however the real labor is normally delegated to a project officer His her job is to transform the desires of the commander into an executable plan This involves blending together the skills and knowledge of several other term members i e Protocol Public Affairs Security Police Transportation Civil Engineering Communications etc Together they will develop the details that must flow smoothly together for a successful ceremony This guide provides basic information for the project officer responsible for a change of command ceremony including the use of support organizations on base The logistics of coordinating the music invitations site preparation and practice and a generic task checklist sample ceremony formats and scrips
