

The development of optics

Man has speculated about vision and light since antiquity. Plato thought that the eye emitted particles that made objects visible. Pythagoras thought that objects projected light particles into the eye. Aristotle thought that particles moved through waves from the objects to the eye. It was not until the 17th century that "light was cast" on its physical properties.

Light debate

The nature of light was long debated among scientists. Isaac Newton (1642-1727) believed light was composed of tiny particles that moved in all right lines. However, later ideas and evidence imposed the wave-like nature of light beams. Among them, the diffraction observed by Francesco Maria Grimaldi (1665), the propagation of Christiaan Huygens's theory of light to a mechanical wave in physical environments, the experiment of the "double slit" by Thomas Young in 1801 and the equations by James Maxwell in 1864, that classified light among electromagnetic waves.

Light as a wave
 It happens but not the appearance of the same nature in light in the 17th century. In 1801, Thomas Young's experiment confirmed it.

When passing through the two slits, the light from a narrow source is split or split or divided following a pattern.

Newton's experiment
 In 1666, Newton built and used a prism to demonstrate that light rays could separate into a spectrum that is made of different particles of energy (photons).

Newton's experiment
 Newton particularly noted the results of his experiment that light rays.

Spectral light

Newton used the same prism to separate the white light into its constituent colors. In this way, Newton's idea, he was able to prove that light that was considered white, was really made up of colored light that becomes their spectrum in different angles by reflection when passing through a prism again, or left Newton gave it the name of "light spectrum".

Light waves
 Newton's light rays were through a prism, but in the middle of the 17th century, Thomas Young showed that light was a wave.

Prism
 Newton thought that the white light was made of different colors, which light was a kind of mixture.

White screen
 In a white screen, light rays are reflected and the color that is made of the spectrum of light, which is called the spectrum of light.

Newton
 He was the first to use the prism to separate light. Newton also showed that light was a wave.
