A contemporary of Vaughan Williams and Cecil Sharp, British composer George Butterworth was a member of the Folk-Song Society and a founding member of the English Folk Dance Society. Butterworth died in the First World War aged 31, and The Banks of Green Willow turned out to be one of his final works. He labelled this short composition for orchestra as 'Idyll' – a poem or piece of music that depicts the simplicity and tranquility of rural life. The work is based on two folk tunes: 'The Banks of Green Willow', heard at the start, and 'Green Bushes', heard after the key change. As in the original version, this arrangement ends with a delicate slow section, returning the listener back to the peaceful countryside, despite the backdrop of the war.
