Introduction

As a term in literary regional studies, Commonwealth literature is generally believed to refer to the literary products of the independent countries of Africa, Asia, the Caribbeans and North America which were once colonised by the United Kingdom. The works of writers from Australia, New Zealand, Canada, India, Malaysia and Singapore are therefore regarded as Commonwealth literature.

This essay proposes to examine the themes, styles and patterns of the development of literatures from these Commonwealth nations. Some of the issues that will be discussed include the general characteristics of Commonwealth literature, the ways in which these common features have been affected by the different cultures and historical development of the individual nations in focus, and the ways in which the development of national literatures has affected the notion of a Commonwealth literature. This essay will, in essence, analyse the major themes and trends that distinguish Commonwealth Literature as displayed in a selection of countries. It will also point out some of the major literary artists from the above-mentioned countries whose works most exemplify these themes and trends.

The term "Commonwealth literature" poses significant problems of definition. The United States is perhaps the most prominent example in this regard. The Republic of Ireland is another. There is also the ironic fact that the literature of the United Kingdom is not regarded as Commonwealth literature, even though its imperial past and language form the basis of the concept of Commonwealth literature.

In spite of all this, however, the designation "Commonwealth literature" has, over time, become a convenient appellation for the literary output of most of the countries that
