

young adult males' labor group, the two women representatives, and the headmaster of the village school. Supported by their community, this group found funding sources and organized the construction and management of an improved well.<sup>4</sup>

Each of these situations involves a common problem: How do residents of an area "build community?" How do they:

- develop and sustain strong relationships?
- increase problem-solving and group decision-making skills?
- improve their ability to collaborate effectively to identify goals and get work done?

How, in other words, do they develop their capacity to blend with other resources to accomplish important tasks, such as attracting new businesses, renovating homes, energizing schools, or reclaiming a burnt and abandoned block?

Citizens who demand more control of their lives, elected officials scrambling to undo decades of urban deterioration, foundation officers seeking the best way to distribute resources—all are asking similar questions about the best ways to "build community."

Our Search for Critical Factors

What leads to successful community building? What distinguishes efforts that succeed from those that fail? Motivated by these questions, our goal is to describe what we know—from the research literature—about community building. We want to:

- Provide a helpful tool for community residents, leaders, and funders who wish to develop their communities in ways that will result in other improvements—whether social, economic, housing, health, educational, safety, or other.
- Publish a reference that reports on and synthesizes what research tells us about community building strategies.
