Discovering how Community Organizing Leads to Social Change Shane R. Brady,2012 Community organizing as an area of social work practice has historic roots in challenging inequality building capacity and meeting the needs of local peoples through taking collective action While the literature of community organizing is rich in conceptual frameworks practice approaches and case studies it lacks the level of formal theory that exists in clinical social work Formal practice theories provide social workers with evidence informed guidance about what to do how to do it and what to expect however social workers engaging in community organizing have little formal practice theory The results of this study build the beginning foundation for a direct practice theory of community organizing that can be utilized by social workers engaged in community organizing to better inform practice In this study I used Delphi methodology to build formal practice theory by exploring the perspectives of nine community organizing experts with an average of nearly 30 years of experience from the union organizing and civil rights organizing traditions Through three waves of data collection I learned that community organizing is a dialectical process that includes three distinct stages community building plan and mobilize These distinct stages do not operate solely in a linear or cyclical fashion but work dynamically with the ever changing social environment to achieve social change My findings support the idea that community organizing is dependent upon the participation and inclusion of local peoples While practitioners have distinct roles in organizing efforts community members determine many aspects of what and how the organizing process unfolds My findings provide the beginning foundation for a direct social work practice theory of community organizing that can be utilized to guide professional practice as well as provide a basis for further research It is through further research that community organizing can be better understood and utilized to create evidence informed interventions that are both respectful and inclusive of community members as well as empirical and evidence informed Community Organization; Theory, Principles, and Practice Murray G. Ross,Ben W. Lappin,1967
