

On arrival, Samuel apparently remained for a short time in New York, where he had relatives. His diary relates that, after receiving word of his mother's death, he left Charleston, South Carolina, on October 12, 1866. Why and how he came to Charleston,²⁷ the extant records do not disclose. We can only conjecture that he may have had relatives in Charleston, South Carolina, which sheltered an old Jewish community, or he may have been attracted by the economic opportunities which this port city afforded. A biographical sketch of Drachman states that "he served through the entire Civil War under General Beauregard and with a creditable military record"²⁸ Dr. B. Sacks, however, was unable to find Drachman's name among the Confederate veterans listed at the National Archives.²⁹

After stops at Santa Barbara and San Pedro, he reached Los Angeles on June 23, 1867, and left for San Bernardino by stage the following day. All this time, his diary refers to letters that he had written to his father. In the interim, his brother Philip wrote him that Isaac Goldberg had left Tucson for San Bernardino, and by July 3rd, Samuel was already at work for Goldberg. Samuel's sister lived in San Bernardino, where he visited her frequently. His diary records that

²⁹ "I looked for Drachman's name on the microfilm index of Confederate Soldiers in the National Archives, but am sorry to report that it does not appear. Although this list is most comprehensive, the possibility exists that there were omissions. . . ." (Correspondence with Dr. B. Sacks, April 30, 1961.)
