Animals Drawn from Nature and Engraved in Aqua-Tinta Charles Catton, 2020-09-28 Being universally esteemed king of the forest deserves a pre-eminence of station we therefore introduce him first to notice The Lion is classed by the Naturalists in the Cat Tribe 'tis an animal of all others the most majestic and stately with a large head the upper part of which with the chin the whole of the neck and shoulders are clothed with a long shaggy hair resembling a mane the hair of the body and limbs is short and smooth but long on the bottom part of the belly a long tail which appears of equal thickness by reason of the increasing length of hair towards the end where it terminates in a large black tuft the colour is tawny or dirty brown the belly part inclines to white The limbs of this animal are of vast strength and need only be seen to convince of their force The country where they most abound is Africa the most wild and desert parts they also are found in parts of Asia but the former appears most congenial to the Lion's constitution those of that country being much larger having been known 5 feet high and 10 feet long and more fierce than of any other place the fiery rays of a torrid climate imparting a feverish heat which animates them with an invincible courage The smell of the Lion is not so perfect as in many other animals but his method of roaring supplies this defect for according to all report when he roars he puts his mouth to the ground thus the sound is universally diffused and not coming stronger from one place than another the terrified animals in their haste to escape frequently run to the very spot they mean most to avoid which by a kind of bounding he quickly secures striking it with great force with his paw he sometimes invades the flocks and with ease will carry off a tolerable sized ox he frequently lies couchant as expressed by Shakespeare with cat-like watch and springs upon his prey by surprise which if he chances to miss in a kind of shamefaced manner he measures back the distance step by step as if to see in which he erred too much or too little This animal will sustain hunger for many days but requires a more frequent supply of drink which it laps like a cat and at every opportunity
