

philosophy of independence inherent to skateboarding presents it as a democratic sport that does not require expensive equipment and welcomes unique identities, styles, and practices (Atencio et al. 6). However, in instances of both sailing and skateboarding, masculine domination has been shown to cause social marginalization of females. The everyday micro-practices and power relationships occurring within the sports have positioned women as inferior skateboarders and sailors, which is a problematic takeaway.

Thus, besides the need to challenge the impact of social status and elitism within sports, it is also necessary to consider the problem of gender domination, and some steps in this direction have been made. For example, such skateboarding publications as Snow, Surf, and Skate Girl Magazine have been challenging the male domination agenda in skateboarding, showcasing success stories of women skaters and challenging the stereotypes that have formed around them (Atencio et al. 6). In the context of sailing, there has not been enough attention paid to the problem of masculine dominance within the sport (Schmitt et al. "If I'm Sailing with a Girl" 4). Evidence strongly suggests that coaches, parents, and trainers have been unsuccessful in addressing the structurally reinforced gender norms.

To conclude, social class and standing do matter in sports, especially when it comes to the access of certain individuals to participating. There are some types of sports that are only accessible and affordable to the "selected few"; while there are also highly inclusive sports that do not discriminate based on social status. However, there is a challenge of exclusion of athletes based on gender, with sports pushing the masculinity agenda and failing to address the challenges that females face when trying to engage in them and develop their skills.
