SOCIAL CHANGE AND CLASSICAL SOCIOLOGICAL THEORIES

In this paper I have tried to present the most important three classical sociological theories about social change i.e., Evolutionary, Functionalist and Marxist Theory. In the first part of this paper, I have presented about the idea of social change in sociology. In the second part of this paper, I have discussed about how these classical theory talks about social change. The common point of these theories is that they all understand social change as a social progress. In the concluding part of this paper, I have mentioned about the theory I like most i.e., Marxist theory and I have also explained the reason why I like conflict theory of social change most of these classical theories.

1. Introduction - Sociology and Social Change:

Sociology is defined as the scientific study of social structure and social interaction and of the factors making for change in social structure and social interaction. Scientific means that sociological knowledge is based on the principle of science where evidence is gathered through observation and experimentation. Social structure is made of the relatively permanent components of our social environment. Social structure imposes order and stability on social life. It also may reconstruct our social behaviour. Sociologists seek to understand how social structure is created, how it changes, and how it affects our lives (Curry, Jiohu, & Schwirian, 2008). Even though social life and structure are relatively stable, they are in a constant process of change. Societies may change due to a natural catastrophe, war, a population explosion or a new invention. Sociology developed more than 100 years ago as the results of intellectuals attempt to explain changes taking place in traditional societies. In Europe, the Industrial Revolution was creating profound and permanent changes. As we look at the varieties of societies from hunting and gathering to post-industrial and as we note that there is a change from communal to associational, societies are constantly undergoing change (Curry, Jiohu, & Schwirian, 2008).

In sociology, social change refers to a change of mechanisms within a social structure. Social change is characterized by changes such as rules of behaviour, values, social organizations and cultural symbols. Social change is difficult to define, because there is a sense in which everything changes, all the time (Giddens, 2006). Every day is a new day; every moment is a new instant in time. Identifying significant change involves showing how far there are alterations in the underlying structure of an object or situation over a period of time (Giddens, 2006). According to Norbert Elias the process of social change can be analysed in two categories: structural and cultural process. Elias contends that the social change is the process of long-term structural change in social relationships. Cast, marriage, kinship, professional groups, religion, and values are aspects of the structural process. Before modernity, the structural process of society was determined by the traditional way, but in the contemporary modern age, every aspect of social structure is changing. Thus, Elias argues that social change is a long-term or enduring change in
