Comprehensive Mental Health Assessment: An Integrated Approach

Lisa A. Brown
Lee Ann Hoff

Assessment, the first step in the nursing process, lays the foundation for making a diagnosis, planning crisis intervention and treatment, implementing the plan, and evaluating results through follow-up strategies. Lack of progress in meeting treatment goals, unanticipated complications, and provider frustration or burnout can often be traced to inadequate or incomplete assessment. Such barriers to effective service delivery are compounded in the psychiatric and mental health practice arena by a key factor in one's experience of emotional distress or mental illness: subjectivity. As discussed in Chapter 2, the meaning that people attach to life events and their emotional, physical, and social sequelae often constitute a major influence on one's healthy or unhealthy response to life's hardships, challenges of role transition, and recovery from traumatic experiences.

In the physical realm, providers can rely on a variety of technological and other objective assessment and diagnostic tools. In the emotional and cognitive spheres, however, although structured assessment tools exist, they are never as accurate as those available for diagnosing physical phenomena precisely because of the subjectivity of people's emotional, cognitive, and spiritual response to life events. To illustrate, the indifferent attitude of a provider ordering laboratory tests for diagnosing a physical problem does not affect the objective laboratory results, although it may exacerbate a client's distress, whereas an indifferent attitude of a provider aiming to ascertain a depressed person's risk of suicide may result in denial of suicidal plans and failure to obtain other data for assessing suicide risk. This means that, in addition to structured assessment guides, the nurse-patient relationship and the provider's communication skills constitute the most essential "tools" in the psychiatric and mental health assessment process (Peplau, 1993).

This chapter begins with an overview and critique of assessment methods and published instruments available to the geropsychiatric nurse: nursing diagnosis, Mini-Mental State Examination (MMSE), Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM), International Classification of Diseases (ICD), and the Comprehensive Mental Health Assessment tool (CMHA). The use of these tools is then illustrated with a case example, with the major focus on the CMHA. This tool (Hoff, Hallisey, & Hoff, 2009) is highlighted for its close correspondence to the emphasis on functional assessment of older persons, whose welfare and treatment outcomes can be compromised
