showing that vacuum tubes had digital uses also But vacuum tubes had their own problems producing too much heat and failing at random Vacuum tube computers also used too much electric power and too much floor space In 1947 a new device was invented that would solve those problems It was the transistor invented at Bell Labs by Shockley Bardeen and Brattain In a few years computer companies were starting to use transistors in their newest machines By 1955 just about all of them had given up on vacuum tubes and switched to transistors Then integrated circuits were invented allowing many transistors to be included on one chip Integrated circuits led to the first microprocessor the 4004 from Intel A few years later the first PC was invented by Steve Wozniak using a microprocessor That was in 1975 Six years later IBM introduced their PC Before the IBM PC many people who used a computer used it remotely connecting with a phone line or a cable Batch processing was the other option The book includes two chapters about important people in the industry plus a glossary a bibliography an index and footnotes
