Biologists believe that both genes and environment cause people who they are. Genetic inheritance provides the blueprint for growth and development, but with the environment's proper influence and stimulation, behavior can change and traits can be developed or suppressed. Some genes are passed on through the process of inheritance, but some are passed on through the process of learning. The environment affects the individual's development through a complex interaction between genetic and environmental factors.

In contrast, biologists who believe in the interactionist approach to development believe that the two factors interact with the individual's ability to respond to it. What they are saying is that the environment influences the individual's behavior, but it is not the only factor that determines the individual's behavior. The individual's behavior is also influenced by the individual's ability to respond to the environment.
