UK's biggest bank vows 'solidarity' with trans workers

Lloyds says it will continue to give support to those affected by Supreme Court ruling

By Hannah Thompson and Tony Elliott

LLOYDS BANKING GROUP has pledged to continue to support trans workers in the UK after the Supreme Court ruled against their rights to be recognised as a protected characteristic under the Equality Act 2010.

The bank said it was committed to supporting all its employees and customers, regardless of their gender identity. It added that it would continue to provide support to trans workers through its Employee Resource Group and other initiatives.

The Supreme Court's decision, which was handed down on 15 March, means that trans workers will no longer be protected from discrimination on the basis of their gender identity. This is a significant setback for the trans rights movement in the UK.

Trans workers have been campaigning for years for recognition as a protected characteristic under the Equality Act 2010. They argue that this is essential for them to be able to work in a safe and inclusive environment.

The Supreme Court's decision is a major blow to trans workers and their supporters. It means that trans workers will now be vulnerable to discrimination on the basis of their gender identity.

Lloyds Bank said it was disappointed by the decision but remained committed to supporting all its employees and customers. It added that it would continue to provide support to trans workers through its Employee Resource Group and other initiatives.

The bank's commitment to supporting trans workers is a positive sign, but it is essential that the government and other organisations continue to support the trans rights movement. This is essential for trans workers to be able to work in a safe and inclusive environment.
