

TYPES OF DAMS

EMBANKMENT

- Constructed from compacted soil ("earthfill") or rock ("rockfill") with an impervious core
- Designed to transfer the entire water load downward
- 80% of all large dams in the U.S. are embankment dams
- Used to retain water across wide river valleys or for flood control
- Typically shorter and wider than other types of dams

GRAVITY

- Constructed of concrete or stone masonry
- Designed to transfer the entire water load downward
- Typically span narrow river valleys with bedrock abutments and foundations
- Retain water by utilizing the weight of the dam to resist the horizontal water load pushing against it
- Each section of the dam is independently stable

ARCH

- Constructed of concrete
- Designed to transfer water loads to the adjacent rock formations
- Constructed only in canyons with solid rock walls that are able to resist the pressure of the dam
- Because the canyon walls bear the bulk of the load, arch dams are thinly constructed, requiring less material than other types of dams

BUTTRESS

- Constructed of reinforced concrete
- Designed to transfer the water load both downward and to the buttresses
- Hollow gravity dams with a solid upstream face and a buttressed downstream side
- Buttresses are supports that transmit the water force to a bedrock foundation

A Crest: The top of the dam, in some cases used to provide a roadway or walkway over the dam

B Heel: The part of the dam in contact with ground on the upstream side

C Toe: The part of the dam in contact with the ground on the downstream side

D Foundation: Excavated surface or undisturbed material

E Spillway: Structure that provides for controlled conveyance of water flow downstream of the dam

F Gallery: Small room within large dams used to monitor the performance of the dam, with a drain on the floor for water seepage

G Outlet: Also called sluiceway, used to release water from the reservoir for water supply, irrigation, and hydro power

H Blowoff: Opening within the dam near the base to drain the reservoir

I Freeboard: Vertical distance between the spillway level and the crest of the dam

J Permeable Material: Substances that allow water to pass through

K Impervious Material: Substances that do not allow water to pass through
