First-Date Expectations

The Impact of Sex of Initiator, Alcohol Consumption, and Relationship Type

This study investigated the impact of three factors (sex of initiator, alcohol consumption, and relationship type) relevant to the dominant American first-date script concerning communication and sexual expectations for first dates. Results indicated that men have higher sexual expectations than do women and that participants' sexual expectations are heightened when alcohol is available. Alcohol availability had complex effects on expectations for communication intimacy. Participants expected more intimate communication when dating partners were close friends than when they were casual acquaintances.

There are several reasons why first dates are of theoretical interest to interpersonal and relational communication scholars. For example, first dates are inherently ambiguous, as they represent a potential relational turning point (Baxter & Ballis, 1986) where a relationship might (or might not) move from platonic to
