Normalisation of Geochemical Data

The contents of trace elements (metals) in sediments of both natural origin and anthropogenic impurities depend primarily on the sediment grain size (Fig. 1). Fine-grained sediments such as silts and clays contain considerably more metals than sands as they are bound mainly by clay minerals and organic matter, and by iron and manganese hydroxides. An elevated content of the sand fraction (>0.063 mm) effects the decrease in absolute content of metals in the whole sample.

If you wish to compare metal concentrations in sediments of different grain size in order to localise polluted areas where metals occur with concentrations higher than normal for the given area, it is important to apply a normalised procedure, i.e. one that enables you to eliminate the effect of deposit particle size on the chemical component content. The simplest way is to separate the sand fractions (>0.063 mm) from the sample before its chemical analysis. This method, however simple to perform, is effective only for sandy-silty sediments. For sands, the content of fractions finer than 0.063 mm is usually very low, so it is difficult to achieve a suitable amount of the material. For silty-clayey sediments, the content of sand fractions is so low that it does not affect the results of the analyses. The separation of the finest fractions from, for example, 0.016 mm or 0.004 mm by using depositional methods, as is sometimes applied, is labour-consuming. Therefore, there are procedures of normalisation used which refer to the total content of a given element in the sample but which are not divided into separated fractions to the component of the reference, the total content of which in the tested sediment is not related to the effect of man-made pollution. The normalisation makes it possible to compare specimens of different grain size and to determine any man-made effect on the contents of chemical components.
