

Mayan society

Like all pre-Columbian societies, Mayan had set a definite social structure based on a well-organized hierarchy. The nobility, priests and soldiers were the elite that dominated the main aspects of administration, war, knowledge and technology. The rest of the population was devoted to productive work, as farmers or craftsmen. The lower class of the social structure was occupied by slaves (right at the opposite of the lord), commoner chief and half man, half woman.

INDIVIDUAL FREEDOM The Mayan society was divided into different social classes. Each class had its own specific rights and responsibilities. The nobility and priests had the most power, while the commoners had the least.

SLAVES Slaves were the lowest class in the hierarchy. They were often captured in wars or bought from other regions. They worked for the elite and had no rights.

WARRIORS Warriors were a special class in the society. They were trained from a young age and fought for their lords. They were highly respected and had a high status.

PEASANTS Peasants were the majority of the commoners. They worked the land and provided food for the society. They were dependent on the elite for protection and trade.
