

Applied Communication Research in the 21st Century

Kenneth N. Cissna

Over a quarter of a century ago, Mark Hickson founded the Journal of Applied Communication Research and ran it virtually single-handedly for its first eight years. The field of communication is indebted to Professor Hickson, both for his vision that alternative, engaged, and socially relevant forms of communication scholarship were possible and desirable, and for his determination to establish an outlet for that scholarship.

When Hickson began JACR, there were only four communication journals published by the two major national associations—Quarterly Journal of Speech, Speech Monographs, Speech Teacher, all published by the Speech Association of America (now the National Communication Association), and the International Communication Association's Journal of Communication—along with one journal published by each of the regional communication associations. None of them published much, if anything, that could be regarded as "socially relevant" or "applied" communication scholarship. Now, not only do we have a journal that publishes exclusively applied communication scholarship, but, equally importantly, some of the others publish applied research as well.

My hope during the years I served as editor of JACR and thereafter was not that "applied communication" would come to be a legitimate and respected area of communication study, but that communication scholarship generally would exhibit more concern for questions and problems that make a difference to people besides ourselves (Cissna, 1982, 1995). I think this is happening, and, thus, I am very encouraged about the future of our field in the 21st century and of the role of applied studies within it.

The definition I used during my editorship was that applied communication research, regardless of context, methodology, setting, or epistemology, was inquiry that sought to make a difference in the world through examining some feature of human communication (Cissna, 1982).¹ Hence, being situated in a context is vitally important in applied communication research, and applied researchers are immersed in and with "real-life" settings and respondents. Applied communication researchers are motivated not only to understand the world, but also to change

Kenneth N. Cissna is a professor in the Department of Communication at the University of South Florida. He served as Editor of JACR for 5 years, for 6 years on the Editorial Boards of NCA's first two editors of JACR, and as an officer of NCA's Applied Communication Section. Send correspondence to the author at Department of Communication, CIS 1040, University of South Florida, Tampa, FL 33620-7800 or by electronic mail to kcissna@funa.cas.usf.edu.
