

WHY MONITOR DRUG THERAPY?

J K Aronson, M Hardman

The peak expiratory flow rate in patients with asthma can be used to monitor diurnal variation in airways resistance and the effects of bronchodilators.

It is common clinical practice to monitor the response to treatment of a disease. Obvious examples include monitoring the treatment of hypertension by measuring a patient's blood pressure, the course of an infection by measuring body temperature, and asthma by measuring the peak expiratory flow rate. The effects of a drug are not often monitored, however, despite the fact that monitoring techniques are available. In this series we will discuss:

- The reasons for monitoring drug treatment
- The ways in which therapeutic responses to drugs can be measured
- Monitoring patient compliance
- Measuring and interpreting plasma drug concentrations as a means of monitoring drug treatment.

Why monitor drug treatment?

Reasons for monitoring drug treatment

1. To see whether there is a therapeutic response
2. To assess drug toxicity
3. To assess compliance

The aim of all drug treatment is to improve the patient's condition, and this aim has two parts: to achieve the maximum therapeutic benefit, and to minimise unwanted effects (such as adverse drug reactions and interactions).

Direct or indirect monitoring of drug treatment may allow the doctor to assess the degree of therapeutic response. No response might indicate that the dosage is inadequate, another drug would be better, the diagnosis is incorrect, or the patient has not taken the drug in the manner prescribed.

Monitoring drug treatment is also important to detect adverse effects. In many cases the correct dose of a drug can be found only by initial trial, subsequent monitoring, and consequent adjustment of the dosage regimen. In making adjustments it is important to remember that the dosage regimen includes the dose of the drug, the route and frequency of administration, and the duration of treatment.

Questions in monitoring drug treatment

Examples of easily measurable therapeutic responses

- Urine output in patients treated with desmopressin for diabetes insipidus
- Intraocular pressure in patients treated with timolol eye drops for glaucoma
- Muscle fatigue in patients treated with pyridostigmine for myasthenia gravis

Is there a directly measurable therapeutic response?

Sometimes the direct therapeutic response can be measured easily. In other instances, however, the interpretation of a measurable response is not so clear cut. For example, an apparent response may be due to spontaneous resolution of the disease, as when a viral sore throat improves spontaneously after an antibiotic has been prescribed inappropriately. An absent measurable therapeutic response to a drug, however, usually suggests that either a change in dosage regimen or a different therapeutic approach altogether is required.
