From state biology to the government of life: historical dimensions and contemporary perspectives of 'biopolitics'

Thomas Lemke
Goethe-Universität, Germany

The notion of biopolitics has recently become a buzzword. While a few years ago it was known to only a limited number of experts, the term is used today in many different disciplines and discourses. Beyond the limited domain of specialists, it is attracting increasing interest among the general public. The notion is employed to discuss asylum policies, but also the prevention of AIDS and questions of demographic change. Biopolitics may be used to denote issues as diverse as financial support for agricultural products, promotion of medical research, legal regulations on abortion, and advance directives of patients specifying their preferences concerning life-prolonging measures.¹

There are a wide range of views about both the empirical object and the normative evaluation of biopolitics. Some argue strongly that biopolitics is necessarily bound to rational decision-making and the democratic organization of social life, while others link the term to the murder of patients, eugenics and racism. The notion of biopolitics figures prominently in texts of the Old Right, but it is also used by representatives of the New Left. It is employed by both critics and advocates of biotechnological progress, by committed Marxists and unapologetic racists. A third line of disagreement concerns historical definitions
