Background

The editorial, "Mis-use of Contrast Detail Curves" [1], which appeared in the July issue has stimulated a vigorous response. The authors, Hasegawa et al., have been challenged in their conclusion that the application of contrast detail curves in the comparative evaluation of CT scanners is fundamentally in error and AJR has been criticized for carrying the editorial without comment from authors with whom Hasegawa et al. disagreed [2-4].

As AJR's editor, I have made a conscious effort to enhance the radiologic physics content of the journal. Papers on the technology of computed tomography and sonography have been encouraged. With assistance from Dr. W. R. Hendee, a new section, Radiological Physics Case Report, has appeared. The editorial was regarded as another device to help keep radiologists abreast of the current contributions that physicists are making to diagnostic imaging.

Before publication the editorial was revised after external review. At publication it seemed a clear explanation of complex interrelationships among imaging variables that are often obscured by complex technical jargon. Moreover, because an editorial, by nature, is an opinion, it is designed to stimulate thought and to raise questions. We meant no slight to earlier authors.

Perhaps such adjectives as "absurd" and "futility" should have been considered more carefully and to this extent, the journal may have erred. However, the responses carried here should clarify the issues raised.

To place the comments that follow in their proper perspective, the reader should first reread the editorial [1]. However, to summarize: Hasegawa et al. point out that contrast detail curves are appropriate for evaluating observer performance in detecting objects of various size and contrast levels, but inappropriate for evaluating the systems that produce the images unless all variables such as object thickness and radiation beam quality which affect image contrast are carefully specified. In a "thought experiment" they reason that two objects of the same diameter but of dissimilar thickness might have the same position on a contrast detail curve if they were exposed at dissimilar kilovoltages. They reason that "thickness/diameter" analysis can be used to compare imaging performance of different systems whereas contrast detail analysis cannot.

Defenders of contrast detail curves are quick to point out that the thought experiment assumes noise-free images and fails to account for relative radiation dosage, a factor that the defenders claim renders the logic of the editorial somewhat unrealistic. This and some other points are discussed in the following letters. Also included is a response from Hasegawa et al. to the points raised. MMF

Incorrect Conclusion

In the July issue, Hasegawa et al. [1] used the editorial forum to criticize what they regard as the incorrect application of contrast-detail (CD) curves to evaluate imaging systems such as CT scanners. They suggested that "... the frequent applications of CD analysis to evaluations of CT scanner performance are erroneous and should be disregarded ...". Since their conclusion is contrary to many recent articles [2, 5-10], I feel compelled to take this opportunity to continue the dialogue so that the readers are not left with misinformation.

Hasegawa et al. [1] correctly point out that object contrast is energy dependent. They then reason that this renders CD analysis invalid for the evaluation of imaging systems. However, their argument is faulty due to their neglect of the following fundamental points:

1. The detectability of large low-contrast objects is a direct function of the signal-to-noise ratio (SNR) in the image.
2. CD analysis provides information regarding the threshold signal-to-noise (SNR<sub>t</sub>) required by an imaging system for a detail of object contrast  $C$  and (large) diameter  $d$  to be perceptible. Hence, it makes no sense to discuss CD analysis in the context of a "noise-free" image.
3. The CD curve can only evaluate an imaging system if the dose (entrance or integral) at which the curve is obtained is included in the analysis. This allows one to determine the dose efficiency of the system, i.e., how efficiently that imaging system uses the incident photons to produce the measured threshold SNR.
4. It is important to distinguish between image contrast (i.e., optical density) and object contrast. The latter quantity depends only on the difference in attenuation between the detail and the background, while the former quantity is additionally dependent on such factors as scatter radiation, film processing, film gamma, window width setting (in CT), etc. In CD analysis the object contrast is plotted since this parameter is constant at a given energy, whereas image contrast in CT is readily changed with the flick of a knob. Mixing these two concepts, as done by Hasegawa et al. [1] in their analogy between conventional radiography and CT, can easily lead to erroneous conclusions.
