

The both silverfish and cockroaches have fairly generalized and flattened bodies modified for scurrying quickly across the ground and fitting into tight spaces.

Modifications of Form

While insects share a basic body plan of segmented regions with appendages, the segments and their associated appendages are modified in ways that reflect evolution as well as function. Because they descend from a common ancestor, silverfish (Zygentoma) resemble one another more than they do insects in other orders, as is the case for cockroaches (Blattodea). Despite being unrelated orders, silverfish and cockroaches actually have somewhat similar body types (flattened). Primitive wood wasps and parasitoid wasps are more closely related (as they both belong to the Hymenoptera), yet their bodies are quite different. While segments and body features change substantially in such cases, it is not too challenging to identify features shared due to common ancestry among the groups.

†† Wood wasps have stout bodies for ovipositing into plants, whereas parasitoid wasps have slender, flexible bodies for ovipositing into mostly other insects.
