

Continuing education for general practice.

1. Experience, competence and the media of self-directed learning for established general practitioners

IAN STANLEY

ALI AL-SHEHRI

PAUL THOMAS

SUMMARY. The arrangements under which continuing education for general practice is provided and attendance by general practitioners is rewarded have now been in operation for three years. More recently, reaccreditation has emerged as a significant issue for the profession. For these reasons it appears timely to review the whole basis of ongoing learning by established general practitioners. In this the first of two papers, learning by established professionals is considered in relation to the educational development of the learner, the role of experience and the goals of competence and performance. It is concluded that self-directed learning based on experience should form the centre-piece of continuing education for general practice and that educational provision should adopt a complementary role in sustaining motivation to learn and by enabling learning from experience to be shared and enriched. A model of self-directed learning, connecting experience and competence through systematic application of three learning media, reading, reflection and audit, is proposed and related to appropriate educational participation by established general practitioners.

Keywords: continuing education; behavioural objectives; self instruction.

Introduction

ALTHOUGH continuing medical education is supported by public funds and perceived by the profession as a means to maintain professional competence,¹ there is little evidence that continuing medical education for general practice is achieving this purpose. The prior educational experience of established general practitioners, the traditional learning formats adopted by such continuing medical education provision and inappropriate models of competence are likely to be contributing to this failure.²⁻⁷ At a more fundamental level it would appear that in continuing medical education there is a gulf between education and practice: in terms of content it is difficult to see the relevance of much educational provision to the day-to-day work of general practitioners; and learning formats rarely draw upon the immediate professional experience of participants.⁸⁻⁹

In 1990, to counter the low uptake by general practitioners of opportunities for continuing medical education,⁷ financial incentives (postgraduate education allowance) and a market approach to continuing medical education provision were introduced in the United Kingdom.⁸ While the new arrangements appear to be creating greater freedom of choice and higher levels of uptake by general practitioners,^{9,10} the quality of learning is open to question.¹¹ Indeed, some have suggested that the new arrangements promote the provision of low cost, unchallenging educational 'junk'.¹²

Recently, reaccreditation has become a topical issue in UK general practice,¹³ reflecting both perceived political pressure and significant support within the profession.¹⁴ While the methodological problems should not be underestimated, essentially a process of reaccreditation must adopt one of two approaches: measure input, in the form of participation in continuing medical education; or output, by assessing competence for the role of general practitioner. However unsatisfactory as a surrogate of professional performance, the former is likely to be the initial approach.¹⁵

In this situation there is an urgent need for general practice to re-examine the theoretical basis of continuing medical education, to explore the determinants of competence in the established practitioner and to identify learning opportunities and outcomes which stem directly from professional experience. In this way, the potential benefits of high levels of uptake are less likely to be squandered in the exercise of choice on inappropriate continuing medical education activities.

This paper considers the ingredients of continuing education for general practice and proposes that experience is the natural substrate of learning. A model connecting professional experience and competence is presented in support of a strategy which places self-directed learning at the centre of continuing medical education for general practice.

Ingredients of continuing education

The learner

Doctors planning to enter general practice emerge from a largely didactic education in medical schools as 'dependent' learners.¹⁶ Experience as a pre-registration house officer¹⁷ and in the hospital component of vocational training for general practice¹⁸ does little to change this way of thinking. Despite the recent widespread adoption of adult learning methods by vocational training it would be optimistic to imagine that one year of practice-based training is successful in converting the majority of trainees to self-directed learning by the time they emerge as principals.¹⁹ Moreover, the large majority of established general practitioners have either not been vocationally trained or completed their training in an era before andragogy²⁰ held sway.

It is characteristic of dependent learners that they look to teachers to 'provide' education either directly or through the dissemination of 'learning' materials.¹⁶ On this basis, the attraction of many established general practitioners to lectures by specialists and to the plethora of journals for their continuing medical education is understandable.^{21,22} The advent of the postgraduate
