chlorhexidine a kind of classical antimicrobial agent used in clinical practice can result in resistance in oral bacteria Similar concerns apply to quaternary ammonium salt which can modify dental filling materials forming long term non releasing antimicrobial dental materials Thus current strategies for caries management are still insufficient In the Post Antibiotic Era there is an urgent need for development of novel strategies including novel antibacterial agents or molecules dental materials potential targets and technologies for caries control by targeting oral biofilms The aim of this Research Topic is to assemble original research articles and reviews that address novel strategies for caries control Specific aspects of interest include novel antibacterial agents or molecules that inhibit biofilm formation promote biofilm dispersal or control biofilm ecology Additionally we seek research on new controlled release or non releasing anti biofilm dental filling materials for secondary caries prevention Other areas of focus include identifying novel potential targets within biofilms such as the biofilm matrix microbial elements or genes and employing innovative anti biofilm technologies that differ from classical methods for caries control We welcome submissions on the subtopics below Novel antibacterial agents or molecules for caries control by targeting biofilms Novel anti biofilm dental materials for caries control Novel potential targets within biofilms for caries control Novel anti biofilm technologies for caries control
