The case for physician assisted suicide: how can it possibly be proven?

E Dahl, N Levy

J Med Ethics 2006;22:335-338. doi: 10.1136/jme.2005.012864

In her paper, The case for physician assisted suicide: not (yet) proven, Bonnie Steinbock argues that the experience with Oregon's Death with Dignity Act fails to demonstrate that the benefits of legalising physician assisted suicide outweigh its risks. Given that her verdict is based on a small number of highly controversial cases that will most likely occur under any regime of legally implemented safeguards, she renders it virtually impossible to prove the case for physician assisted suicide. In this brief paper, we suggest some ways that may enable us to weigh the risks and benefits of legalisation more fairly and, hopefully, allow us to close the case for physician assisted suicide.

On November 8, 1994, the US state of Oregon passed the Death With Dignity Act permitting physician assisted suicide. Because of a legal injunction, implementation of the act was delayed by almost three years. After multiple legal proceedings, including a petition that was denied by the United States Supreme Court, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals finally lifted the injunction on October 27, 1997. Ever since, Oregon has been the only state in the US where physician assisted suicide (PAS) is a legal medical option.

The Death With Dignity Act (DWDA) allows mentally competent, terminally ill patients who are over 18 years of age and residents of the state of Oregon to obtain a prescription for a lethal dosage of medication to end their own life in case their suffering becomes unbearable. Patients eligible for the act must make one written and two oral requests over a period of 15 days. The prescribing physician and a consulting physician have to confirm the diagnosis and the prognosis. If either doctor believes the patient's mental competence is impaired, he must be referred for a psychiatric or psychological evaluation. The prescribing physician is required to inform the patient of potential alternatives to PAS, such as comfort care, hospice care, and pain control.¹

Between 1997 and 2004, 208 individuals died under the provisions of the DWDA. In 1998, 16 Oregonians used PAS, followed by 27 in 1999, 27 in 2000, 21 in 2001, 18 in 2002, 42 in 2003, and 37 in 2004. Thus, PAS accounts for only one in 1,000 deaths among Oregonians. Interestingly, about 36 per cent of patients who obtained a lethal dose of barbiturates from a doctor never used it, suggesting that all these patients sought was control over the manner and timing of their deaths. As Timothy E Quill recently put it: "Perhaps the knowledge that they could end their life if they so desired makes them feel less trapped—and therefore freer to keep going".²

The most frequently reported reasons for choosing PAS under the DWDA are "loss of autonomy" (57%), "loss of dignity" (50%), and "loss of the ability to enjoy the activities that make life worth living" (44%). Concerns about being a "burden on family and friends" (36%), "fear of excruciating pain" (22%), and financial problems (3%) are surprisingly low. Of the 208 patients, 196 died at home; only one died in an acute care hospital.

Opponents of the act predicted that the patients most likely to avail themselves of PAS would be the poor, the ill educated, and the uninsured who are without access to adequate hospice care.³ According to the Oregon Department of Human Services, however, which monitors compliance with the DWDA, the overwhelming majority of patients seeking physician assisted suicide are financially well off, highly educated, and have health insurance. On average, 86 per cent of patients using the act are enrolled in hospice care. As a matter of fact, it seems that the legal option of PAS may actually have contributed to the improvement of end of life and hospice care in Oregon. As the Oregon Department of Human Services points out:

While it may be common for patients with a terminal illness to consider physician assisted suicide, a request for a prescription can be an opportunity for a medical provider to explore with patients their fears and wishes around end of life care, and to make patients aware of other options. Often once the provider has addressed patients' concerns, they may choose not to pursue physician assisted suicide. The availability of assisted suicide as an option in Oregon also may have spurred Oregon doctors to address other end of life care options more effectively. In one study Oregon physicians reported that, since the passage of the Death with Dignity Act in 1997, they had made efforts to improve their knowledge of the use of pain medications in the terminally ill, to improve their recognition of psychiatric disorders such
