Human immunodeficiency virus HIV the cause of acquired immune deficiency syndrome AIDS now infects more than a million people in the United States and millions more in other countries The cases of AIDS reported thus far are only the beginning of the expected toll because the damage the virus inflicts on the immune system and the resulting inability of the victim to fight off infections and cancers may not be apparent until years after initial infection The epidemic is growing every day partly because persons who may not know they are infected are spreading the virus HIV is spread in only a few ways transmission by anal or vaginal intercourse by intravenous IV drug use and from mother to fetus or newborn infant now predominate Infection occurs mostly in young adults usually the healthiest segment of the population Federal agencies notably the Centers for Disease Control the National Institutes of Health and the Food and Drug Administration have contributed enormously to the rapid acquisition of knowledge about AIDS and HIV or to techniques to help in its control They should continue their efforts but greater involvement of the academic and private sectors should be encouraged Continuing evaluation of many matters will be needed including the spread of HIV directions for research and development the effectiveness of various efforts to promote risk reducing behavior and the appropriate level of national effort There is also a need to mobilize existing resources and encourage interaction of the public and private sectors To fill these needs and also for informing the American public Congress and the executive branch the committee proposes a National Commission on AIDS created either as a presidential or joint presidential and congressional entity The commission should act in an advisory capacity because the need for integration of the nation s efforts is not presently such as to require central control that supplants the existing administrative structures New York Court of Appeals.
