

CONNECTIONS OF THE FRONTAL CORTICES OF THE MONKEY

WALTER H. WATSON, JR., and
 GEORGE W. WATSON, JR.,
 Department of Psychology,
 University of California,
 San Diego, California

Connections of the frontal cortex of the monkey were studied by means of the Golgi method. The results show that the frontal cortex is highly interconnected with the rest of the brain. The connections are most dense in the prefrontal cortex and become sparser as they approach the posterior pole. The connections are also more numerous in the upper layers of the cortex than in the lower layers. The results suggest that the frontal cortex is a highly organized and integrated part of the brain.

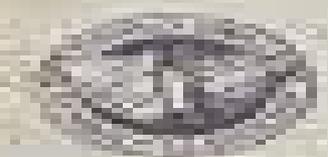

The Golgi method is a technique for staining individual neurons in the brain. It is particularly useful for studying the morphology and connections of neurons in the central nervous system.

The results of this study show that the frontal cortex of the monkey is highly interconnected with the rest of the brain. The connections are most dense in the prefrontal cortex and become sparser as they approach the posterior pole.

The connections are also more numerous in the upper layers of the cortex than in the lower layers. The results suggest that the frontal cortex is a highly organized and integrated part of the brain.
