Conscience and Truth

Abstract: The immediate background to this essay is the contemporary expression of the relationship between conscience and truth in Catholic theology. The methods pursued are historically and textually based. Historically, there is a clear development in how Catholic theology has dealt with this relationship. Textually, three significant theologians are cited to explain this development (Augustine of Hippo, Thomas Aquinas, and Alphonsus de Liguori). The conclusions reached indicate a strategy for a more robust Catholic expression of how conscience and truth can be explained.

Keywords: conscience; truth; anthropology; doctrinal; pastoral

1. Introduction

Doing the truth in love is a biblical way to explain the Christian moral life. In contemporary moral theology, this is frequently expressed as the duty to follow one's conscience. How and why this change in terminology has become accepted is the argument of this essay. The issue identified is that of certainty. Although both truth and conscience, taken unto themselves, can be examined in terms of their particular binding force, it is the space in which the two overlap that is the focus of this paper. The certainty of truth is one thing; the certainty of conscience is another. Where truth and conscience meet in the practical life of a disciple raises the question: is it the same modality of certainty that is applicable?

Conscience-duty as an obligation can have a preliminary appeal for Catholics: it relates religious belief to an idea not confined to the sphere of faith. The significance of conscience is acknowledged outside of formal religious churchgoers, confirmed by the International Day of Conscience sponsored by the United Nations since 2019. This initial appeal weakens with the consideration that there is no general acceptance of what conscience means. The UN text describes conscience as a moral compass guiding humanity towards a brighter and better future. This remit could be described in other ways, such as the Russian sovest or the Chinese ling zhi. If asked whether I have a duty to follow my conscience, I could reply, 'it all depends'. This is not necessarily an evasive response. Conscience does not have a fixed and shared definition. If there is no consensus on what conscience means, this is very much the case with the question of Pilate: 'what is truth'. Truth can be called certain; so too can conscience. What binds a person is the truth as perceived and applied in conscience. This is a debate that has been central to the Catholic tradition, and it is the reason why the explanation of certainty is central to that debate.

2. The Contemporary Catholic Understanding of Conscience

The Catholic acceptance of the final dignity of conscience has been a begrudging one, although the concept has never been formally repudiated. Catholicism, however, has come to be more and more identified as a creed of authority. Truth and conscience, rather than conscience and truth, would have been a more typical title for Catholic debate. In the earlier decades of the last century, Catholic defenders of conscience became vocal by critiquing totalitarian ideologies, including Church ones. Conscience appealed to the Catholic instinct for the common good that respects the particular good of an individual's life, including the rights of conscience. In the later decades of the twentieth century, the debate about the
