

Consent in clinical practice

Information

Patients should be given sufficient information to understand their treatment and give valid consent.

Free will

Patients should give their consent voluntarily and not be coerced.

Capacity

Patients must be able to understand the information given, retain the information for a long enough period to make a decision, use the information in the decision-making process and be able to communicate the information back to their doctor.

Is the patient unconscious?

Where a patient is unconscious, doctors should provide medical treatment that is in the patient's best interests and immediately necessary to save their life.

Is it an emergency?

Consent is required before any clinical examinations, investigations or treatment. This can be verbal instead of written but must be documented in the patient's notes.

The patient must not be pressured into making a decision but must be made aware of any potential harm that could be caused by delay.

Does the patient speak English?

If a patient does not speak English, professional interpreters should be used where possible. Hospital employees should not be used as interpreters except in emergency situations.

Family and friends should not be used as translators as they can unfairly influence the decision-making process.

In an emergency, where a translator cannot be found, the clinician should act in the best interests of the patient and document all decisions in their notes.

What if the patient withdraws consent?

A patient can withdraw consent to treatment at any time.

If a procedure has already started it should be stopped when safe to do so.
