ABSTRACT

The duty to benefit one's patient sometimes appears to conflict with the wishes of the patient. This conflict can be resolved by examining the nature of benefit, of competent choice, and of unusual and erroneous beliefs.

Introduction

On September 3, 1983, Elizabeth Bouvia admitted herself to the psychiatric inpatient unit of Riverside (California) General Hospital. Ms. Bouvia, age 26, was a paraplegic with extensive impairment. She also suffered from severe arthritis. She was unable to feed herself. After several days on the ward for treatment of depression and suicidal ideation, she declared that she no longer wished to live. She refused assistance in eating, stating that she wished to remain in the hospital, receive hygienic care and pain medication, and be allowed to die. The medical staff and the hospital administration objected and sought court authority to feed by nasogastric tube. Authority was granted and, for the next 116 days, Elizabeth Bouvia was treated involuntarily. She left Riverside Hospital on April 7, 1984.

In the same month that Ms. Bouvia entered Riverside Hospital, four persons in northern California undertook a "Fast For Life." They declared they would not eat until the governments of the world made a significant gesture toward reduction of the nuclear arms race. These four fasters had compatriots in Paris and in Tokyo and a coterie of supporters around the world. Each of them was a person of intelligence and dedication who had reflected deeply on the nature and consequences of his undertaking. After several weeks, two fasters began to have symptoms that, in the judgment of their physicians, might require inpatient treatment. When asked whether they would accept hospitalization, they agreed on the condition that they
