Best Truth Intelligence In The Information Age:

Best Truth Bruce D. Berkowitz, Allan E. Goodman, 2012 Bruce D Berkowitz and Allan E Goodman call for fundamental radical reforms in the organization and approach of America s intelligence agencies They show why traditional approaches to intelligence fall short today and they propose thoughtful alternatives that take into account recent changes in information technology and intelligence requirements An information age intelligence service would move away from a rigid hierarchical structure toward a more fluid networked organization the authors explain They recommend a system that would utilize the private sector with its access to more capital and its ability to move more quickly than a government organization At the same time this system would encourage government intelligence operations to concentrate on the specialized high risk activities they are uniquely able to perform Berkowitz and Goodman examine recent failures of the intelligence community discuss why traditional principles of intelligence are no longer adequate and consider the implications for such broad policy issues as secrecy covert action and the culture of the intelligence community Best Truth Bruce D.
