Between Ourselves Donald Smith, 2013-07-22 The six months that Robert Burns spent in Edinburgh between the Ayrshire years and the short lived maturity in Dumfries were an intense time in the life of a poet who became a Scottish hero Burns is an icon but he is a flawed one The great bard was fond of drink women and over familiar with Edinburgh s underworld He was often conflicted with crippling self doubt about his talents and bitter about his place in society During his short time in Edinburgh Burns had dealings with the infamous Deacon Brodie was struck by inspiration and failed by his muse and fell in love with two unavailable women and bedded many more than that While never straying from accepted Burns history this remarkable novel imagines the life of Burns in those months to discover the flesh and blood man behind the legend BACK COVER Among the dirt and smoke of 18th century Edinburgh the great poet ponders his next move Frustrated with the Edinburgh literati and the tight purse of his publisher Burns finds distraction in the capital s dark underbelly Midnight assignations with working girls and bawdy rhymes for his tavern friends are interrupted when he is unexpectedly called to a mysterious meeting with a dangerous man But then Burns falls in love perhaps the only real love in a lifetime of casual romances with beautiful Nancy the inspiration for Ae Fond Kiss Donald Smith has woven the real life love affair of Nancy and Burns into a tantalising tale of passion and betrayal binding historical fact and fiction together to create an intimate portrait of Burns the man
