directly related to differences in the timing of Canadian and American sons and daughters departure from home American youths left home and married about two years earlier than their Canadian counterparts did Differences in the life course transitions of youths were in turn a product of distinctive demographic and economic structures and similar gender norms north and south of the border As with the quantitative findings described in this dissertation qualitative research on inter generational relationships inside and outside the household demonstrate that adult children needed the assistance of their elderly parents as much as their aging seniors needed them More importantly documentary evidence on ties with parents children siblings friends and neighbors demonstrate the important role played by proximity in sustaining close supportive relationships This evidence confirms the importance of studying co residence patterns within the household It also suggests that collective emotional differences between Canadian and American families resulted from structural differences in their living arrangements
