

DODSWORTH

By
SINCLAIR LEWIS

Sam Dodsworth has just sold out his automobile business to a great motor trust and now has money to go after the things which he feels he has missed and which his wife desires. They close their house in Zenith and go abroad for an indefinite stay. The book is of these two and of how they get along together in their new surroundings. It raises the question of what successful business men are going to do with their leisure when they have made their "pile" and retired. Where do they belong and what friends can they have? Incidentally, Mr. Lewis gives a picture of Europe quite different from the romantic one so often painted. He shows a Europe where travelers can be thrilled, but where they can also be lonely and uncomfortable and lost.

Above all the book is the story of the American husband and American wife—a study of American marriage, its confusion, its embarrass, perhaps its finality. It asks what all classes are making out of it—the American husband wife-ridden? Are American husbands unskilled in holding the affection of their wives? Are men and women aiming at the achievement of different values?
