

Does Australia Need a Bill of Rights? Essay Example

Individual Rights and Freedoms, and the Constitution. For over 100 years now, Australia has operated under its rather prized constitution that is in hindsight evidently lacklustre in respect to individual rights and freedoms. The Australian constitution was thought to be sufficient in regards to rights and freedoms despite the lack of an entrenched bill of rights. However, when one dissects the constitution, it becomes increasingly evident that constitutional implications are not an effective way of protecting individual rights and freedoms, and the only way to achieve this is through a bill of rights. This is not to say that our constitution bears completely no recognition of rights, as there are some provisions that do in fact recognize certain rights and freedoms for individuals.

This includes s116, s80 and s41. The Australian constitution amongst its express rights also contains implied rights, and the adequacy of these implied rights is rather debatable, as it becomes increasingly apparent that the extraction of our individual rights and freedoms from constitutional implications is an inconsistent and primitive way of dealing with rights, as the essence is lost somewhere down the track, and we find our freedoms being questioned and removed at the hands of the judicial system. Express rights in the constitution Under s116, "the commonwealth shall not make any law for establishing any religion, or for imposing any religious observance, or for prohibiting the free exercise of any religion". This section is very direct and assertive, and could easily lead one to believe that the commonwealth, under no circumstance, will prohibit the free exercise of any religion.

However, even this clear-cut statement in the constitution has not held up in court, as it is overridden in Krygger v Williams, where one man is forced to undergo military training, despite its contradiction to his religious beliefs, allowing conscription laws to overpower an express right in the constitution. Off course, it's not as clear cut as this, as the courts may have their reasons for rejecting the argument; however it gives us insight into how the constitution itself can be ambiguous at times and rights can in fact be taken away. Furthermore, s80 of the constitution basically requires that an "indictable offence" must proceed with a trial by jury. Again, we see a direct statement in the constitution that clearly illustrates a right that is given to us. However, if we look at the judicial system in Australia, relatively few cases receive a trial by jury, due to the fact that the definition of an "indictable offence" is left for the government to decide.

Nonetheless, another question is raised in respect to the limitations of a trial by jury. Our constitution leaves room for ambiguity, which in turn can lead to the loss of certain rights. Under New Zealand's constitution, the bill of rights grants the right to a trial by jury to those who
