

11.29 Continent-continent collision

▲ The continent on the left has a passive continental margin, while the continent on the right has an active subduction margin.

▲ As the continents move closer, the ocean between the converging continents is eliminated. The oceanic crust is telescoped, creating a succession of overlapping thrust faults, which ride up, one over the other.

▲ As the slices become more and more tightly squeezed, they are forced upward. The upper part of each thrust sheet turns horizontal, forming a nappe, which then glides forward under gravity. A mass of metamorphic rock forms between the joined continental plates, welding them together. This new rock mass is the continental suture.
