

FLUORIDES

Fluoride occurs naturally in food and water. It is absorbed mainly in the intestine. It is widely distributed but is concentrated in teeth and bones. The kidney is the major route of excretion.

■ Actions on Teeth

Teeth are composed mainly of calcium hydroxyapatite. Fluoride exchanges with hydroxyl ions to form calcium fluorapatite, which is more stable in acid than calcium hydroxyapatite. This makes outer layers of the enamel harder, so the teeth are resistant to acid attack. Fluoride prevents decalcification of enamel by acids and prevents caries. It promotes re-mineralization of enamel, which has been demineralized. It is concentrated in plaque and inhibits microbial enzymes required for acid production.

■ Use of Fluorides

Dental caries: Caries is a degenerative condition characterized by disintegration of teeth starting from the periphery in the enamel and gradually extending to the pulp/soft tissues. Microorganisms present in the oral cavity act upon residual carbohydrates to produce acids. Acids attack the teeth leading to demineralization of enamel and finally cavitation. There is increased incidence of dental caries in areas where drinking water is deficient in fluorides. Fluorides are used in the form of fluoridated drinking water, supplements, toothpaste, gel and foam, varnish and mouthwash.

► Fluoridation of Drinking Water

Fluoridated drinking water has optimal concentration of fluoride and is effective in preventing caries in children and adults. The optimal level of fluoride in drinking water is 1 ppm. This optimal level occurs either naturally or is obtained by addition of fluoride to community water supply (sodium fluoride is used).

► Fluoridated Toothpaste

On brushing, fluoride in toothpaste is taken up by plaque and demineralized enamel. Its concentration is also transiently increased in saliva from where it is taken up by the plaque. Sodium fluoride, sodium monofluorophosphate and stannous fluoride are the commonly used fluoride salts.
